"The Feast of the Red Corn"

ARGUMENT

The maidens of the Wanta tribe of Indians once every year celebrate the Feast of the Red Corn. The one who in the Feast finds the first red ear of corn has her dearest wish granted, unless there has been some great offense committed. This year the Queen Weeda Wanta, joins the maidens, hoping to learn of the welfare of the Chief, long absent.

The old squaw says that no wish will be granted at this feast, because a great crime has been committed. Impee Light, the Queen's younger sister, is suspected of being the culprit, and is threatened with burning at the stake. She diverts the attention of the maidens from her guilt, by her tales, and finally makes the Queen believe her the heroine in the rescue of Fudgee, Pudgee and Wudgee, the Queen's children. Appeased, the old squaw undertakes to invoke the winds again; they hear; the Queen finds the Red Ear, and is granted a vision of her Chief alive and on his journey home.
